

Job Listings

Keyword:

Location:

Search jobs

See Job Result

We've set the precedent for success.

Sign Up for LawCrossing today.

Try it now!

Justin Bieber Starts Another Fight: Should We Blame Teen Stardom?

Justin Bieber was recently implicated in a bar fight that left a man unconscious in a parking lot. Though it is believed that members Bieber's "posse" were the ones directly involved with the assault, and that the victim had acted aggressively as well, this incident is the latest in a string of bad behavior for the pop star.

Is Justin Bieber a bad apple, or does teen stardom inevitably lead to a troubled early adulthood? We spoke with a few experts to find out.

Get JD Journal in Your Mail
 Subscribe to our FREE daily news alerts and get the latest updates on the most happening events in the legal, business, and celebrity world. You also get your daily dose of humor and entertainment!!

Your Email Address

SUBSCRIBE

I'm a well-known psychiatrist – and expert witness – who is regularly called upon to analyze celebrities' behavior – including Justin Bieber. Child stars are notorious for getting into trouble as they grow up because:

- their fans want them to stay little and cute so that time can seem to stand still
- the public gets bored with them after a while
- they've outlived their 15 minutes
- they stop trying so hard to please and want to live on their laurels.

Carole Lieberman M.D.

America's Psychiatrist
Media Psychiatrist and Bestselling Author
www.drcarole.com

Child celebrities are exposed to the demands of the adult world, most significantly to the criticism and bashing of the celebrity culture.

They did not have time to develop the emotional skills to handle the feeling of shame and to develop good self-worth. So when exposed to criticism, it feels emotionally threatening and the brain reacts in a primal fashion, similar to a reaction to a physical threat. This is the fear response or the "fight-or-flight" response. They may get angry, lash out or have outlandish outbursts, all in an effort to protect themselves the only way they know how.

granted

Genies might have three wishes.

But we have thousands of jobs.

Click here to see which one's right for you.

This shouldn't be surprising at all if we look at it as a normal protective response.

Harper West, MA, TLLP

Licensed Psychotherapist

Author of "Pack Leader Psychology"

Not all child actors, musicians and stars grow up angry or ill behaved. In fact, Ricky Schroder is an example of a child actor who has grown up to be a very productive and respectful adult actor, husband and father. And whether you think they're weird or not, the Olson twins have become responsible adult fashionistas. Jody Foster, a child star, herself, is now a single mother and adult actress and director. And there are more. However, there are reasons that children who become stars, like Lindsay Lohan and Justin Bieber to name two, also become badly behaved:

* Child stars are treated unrealistically. They have power and money and adults kowtow to them in order to either ride the money train as agents, managers, momagers, dodgers and others — or simply to not lose their own jobs at the whim of a child or tween who has the director's ear. They are not held to the same responsibilities that normal kids are, like getting grounded for bad behavior or bad grades. This sets kids up to have an unrealistic view of life as an adult.

* Child stars are around adults behaving badly a lot more often than regular children are. Child stars grow up on television and movie sets as well as on concert tours where drugs, sex, bad behavior and bad language are the norm. These kids, like the former child star Drew Barrymore, are offered drugs, valued for their sexualized images and interacting with adults in ways that normal children who interact with their teachers, their sports coaches and their friends' parents, are not.

* When child stars become teens, their hormones act up like any other person's would — only they have money, cars, power, sex, drugs, jobs and a team of professionals — that they can use and manipulate in ways that normal kids don't. They often blow through millions of dollars they've earned as child stars, on drugs, impulsive spending and in Bieber's case, cars.

* Parents of these child stars are often different than normal parents. They take derivative pleasure in the spotlight and in their child's success. You'll sometimes see Little League dads imposing their own athletic dreams on their kids — and fisticuffs break out in the stands as a result. In Hollywood, these parents grab their own little sliver of their child's spotlight — Bieber's mom just published a book, the Kardashian mom grabbed her own talk show, and former child star, McCauley Culkin, broke ranks with his parents for taking a cut of his paychecks. These are not parents who steer their kids towards a productive life. Instead, these parents steer kids into the spotlight to fulfill dreams they couldn't.

April Masini
Advice Columnist

<http://www.askapril.com>

It's the same story behind Lindsay Lohan, Amanda Bynes, Miley Cyrus, and so many other child stars. Once they become the "ward of the PR professional" they lose all hope for discipline (and I do NOT mean physical punishment), consequences, or moral direction. When these kiddos get larger than life and every adult on the planet is at their beck and call, they can do no wrong and everyone breaks their back to make/keep them happy.

They never learn things like "sometimes I love you, but I don't like you," or, "that behavior was unacceptable. You're grounded!" There are no lessons on how to be a decent human being, because no one cares about these kids growing up to make great friends, get a decent job and live a happy family life! All they care about is keeping the chimp happy so it performs well and brings in the cash. Moms and Dads (and grandparents and any other good role model) are pushed out of the picture and/or silenced so as not to upset the